Redcliffe Park Wall
mainroads
As part of the Gateway WA Perth Airport and Freight Access Project a number of public art pieces of varying themes were commissioned and installed. Redcliffe Park Wall is one of the pieces that was designed to create a lasting impression for road users, residents and visitors to Western Australia.
Redcliffe Park Wall involved the design and application of a painted artwork to the side of a six metre high wall, constructed as part of the Gateway WA project.
The artwork is a mural piece divided into three sections on the wall. Individual panels are made up of traditional ethnic designs representing the various multicultural groups in the community. The panels are framed by a top boarder of portraits created by children in the community and a chain of dancing figures along the bottom of the wall that represent the active community.
Leanne Bray was the artist of the Redcliffe Park Wall. Leanne collaborated with the community of the Redcliffe area to create the design. Several local schools and community groups were contacted and invited to become involved in the artistic process of developing the mural project. Public meetings, workshops and displays of the concepts led to the final design.
This artwork is a celebration of community. The inspiration behind the piece of art came predominantly from the people of the Redcliffe area and their insight into what community means to them. The information that was gleaned from the groups added importance to the idea of an active, compassionate and busy society. The list below are the priorities for the consultation groups' ideas of community:
